Foxes and Hounds.

The fox hunters of this city, says the Hartford Times, have not had the usual run of luck this winter, two brushes only attesting their exploits. But the gunners in neighboring towns may have done much better, judging by the fact the Foxham brothers of South Windsor have bagged nine foxes this season.

A chat with an old fox hunter is pretty sure to develop something interesting, and yesterday one of them was telling about running a fox with a cry-bought when the crust of the snow was strong enough to bear them up. A greyhound can readily outrun a fox, while a foxhound runs them down by great endurance, sometimes being nearly thirty hours on the trail. The hunter follows the scent by the sight or the cry, the latter by the scent or the cry.

The last time of running the fox on the coast was related by Mr. O. B. Moore, of Windsor, who owned a greyhound and a foxhound at the same time. While the greyhound is pretty sure to catch a fox when he gets his eyes upon him within a reasonable distance, in this case, although repeatedly close to him, the hound was completely baffled by the cunning of the fox.

The whole thing was plain sailing and in plain sight, but too far away for Mr. Moore to take a hand with his gun, though he watched it with eager interest. Both fox and hound were doing their level best, though the latter rapidly outdistanced the former. Very quickly the hound was close upon the fox and Mr. Moore says he expected the dog would seize the fox almost instantly when, quick as a flash, the fox brought his body round down upon the hound and using it as a ladder, whirled quick about and let the hound shoot past him with the speed of an arrow, and before the dog could stop himself on the icy crust the cunning fox had crossed the start of him on a new track. But the hound, not being daunted, again commenced a hot pursuit, and when he had almost overtaken him a second time the fox dodged him in the same manner. And this he did for seven times in succession, though two or three times, when the fox turned, the dog gave him a head with his teeth. After the seventh failure the fox managed to lose himself in a patch of woods, and the greyhound was cheated of his prey. Moore then shot his hound, and, finding him upon the scent, had the good fortune to bag the animal and saw the wounds made by the hound. He felt that that fox deserved its liberty, but a foxhunter never allows any feeling of sentiment to interfere with business.

While the above shows a phase of fox hunting, here is an incident showing how quick in motion they are. One day Mr. Libbie, the Granby stage driver, saw in a field near the road, somewhere between that town and Barst, a fox panting from over exertion, and near by a young hound that had run him down, but had not the courage to grapple with the animal at bay. Mr. Libbie, with whip in hand, advanced upon the hound and struck at him with the butt of his heavy whip. The fox, unable, owing to the death of snow, to dodge the blow, caught the whip handle in his teeth and held on so firmly that he was drawn up to the feet of Libbie. Another blow, however, dispatched him.

Another interesting feature of fox hunting is the fight between hound and fox, when the latter has been run down. The fox is very apt to resist the dog by the nose, and some hounds dislike this treatment so much that they are loath to tackle in with the fox a second time, while others take the punishment as a matter of course, and are always ready for the dash grapple.

In this connection, Mr. Chester Hubbard, of this city, the veteran fox hunter, tells of the action of a hound he once owned, which showed the animal to be rather more philosophical than dogs generally are. If a fox pinned him through the nostrils he would not aggravate matters by flapping around, but would sit quietly down and wait for the fox to get ready to let go. Then he would go for him. But this was not all. The hound seemed to be determined not to sully the humiliation of having his nose held to the ground by the fox and then have the fox escape, as they sometimes will after having held the dog long enough to recover their wind. So when a fox pinned him in the nose this philosophical hound would squat down and place his fore paws on the hound's neck, and when the fox let go his hold the hound held him with his paws until he could bring his teeth into play, when the fox had to surrender. This was where the second "fight" was the best.
